

Supporting someone with psychosis

Walking alongside someone who experiences psychosis can be challenging at times. You may go through difficult times with your loved one. Your aroha and āwhina (support) will make a huge difference.

Remember that any strategies for recovery might not immediately feel useful to the person themselves. Readiness to accept a diagnosis, a new meaning for experiences, and therefore help, can take time. They are going through changes to the way they relate to themselves and the world around them which is sometimes very hard to make sense of.

- Maintain connection and build trust – whanaungatanga is often key to recovery. Keep in touch and keep them included.
- Ask them what they need. Try not to take over.
- Remember that psychosis is an illness and is not anyone's fault. It is important not to blame or judge, even when we don't understand what is going on for them.
- We all need the same things for a good life – connections, a safe home, freedom from worries and a meaningful role in the community. As whānau and friends, you can help them build this.
- Encourage and support them to seek treatment, and to persevere with therapy and medication. Recovery will be an ongoing process.
- Find ways to look after yourself and maintain your own wellbeing. Find out more at mentalhealth.org.nz/wellbeing.

Stay connected

Photography: Cover image Kdshutterman, Dreamstime; this image by StockSnap from Pixabay.

Keep learning

Learn more about psychosis and strategies that can help you. See websites such as healthify.nz, Talking Minds, and the Hearing Voices Network NZ. Find book reviews at mentalhealth.org.nz/books.

Use digital tools available free online: check out aroawellbeing.co.nz, smallsteps.org.nz, thelowdown.co.nz, or justathought.co.nz. You can also try breathing, sleep or mindfulness apps on your phone.

Helplines

Free call or txt 1737 anytime for support from a trained counsellor. For a list of helplines, visit mentalhealth.org.nz/helplines.

Resources

The Mental Health Foundation has a range of information and resources on mental health and wellbeing available to order for free: shop.mentalhealth.org.nz.

Contact us

Resource & Information Service
Email: info@mentalhealth.org.nz

Find us online

- www.mentalhealth.org.nz
- mhfnz
- mentalhealthfoundationNZ

Help us to help others

The Mental Health Foundation is a charity and we rely on donations to support our work. Visit mentalhealth.org.nz

Disclaimer

This brochure should not be used in place of an accurate diagnosis or assessment. If you think you may have psychosis or would like further information or support, please talk to your GP or Māori health provider.

This resource was produced with input from many people. Special thanks go to Mark Rose, clinical psychologist, and Chloe Shaw.

Mental Health Foundation 2023

Psychosis

 Mental Health Foundation
OF NEW ZEALAND
mauri tū, mauri ora
www.mentalhealth.org.nz

Our vision: a society where all people flourish.

What is psychosis?

Psychosis is a term used in psychiatry to describe when someone experiences reality differently from other people. It can mean hearing, feeling or seeing things others can't, or believing things differently from everyone around you.

A psychotic episode can occur as part of an illness, a traumatic experience, alcohol or drug use, or a mental health condition such as schizophrenia or bipolar disorder.

Some people experience a psychotic episode just once, or a few times, in their lives. For others, psychotic episodes happen often, with little break in between.

Experiencing psychosis can be distressing, both for the person and their whānau and friends. But help is available and with support one can learn to manage the experiences and create recovery that is meaningful.

'Recovery' may not mean you no longer experience psychosis at all. Instead, it may mean you are able to live well, with or without psychotic episodes.

What is psychosis like?

Everyone's experience of psychosis is unique, but there are common themes:

- Hallucinations: seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting and smelling things that aren't there. Hearing voices is a common experience - this can be positive and comforting, or it can be disturbing and scary.
- Delusions: believing things that are not based on reality. This could be a belief that you can read minds or predict the future.
- Paranoia: the delusion that you are being followed or watched, or that others are out to get you.
- Disorganised thinking, speech and behaviour: talking fast, jumping from topic to topic, being hard to understand or follow.

The emotional response to these experiences can include feeling scared, confused, suspicious, frustrated, upset, abandoned and more.

It's important to note that some of these experiences are relatively common. Some people can make sense of them in a cultural or spiritual context. You would only be treated for psychosis if it is causing you distress and preventing you from living well.

Prejudice and discrimination

Psychosis is not well understood in our society. Many people think that people with a psychotic episode are dangerous. The truth is that the majority of people who experience psychosis will never be violent.

Many also think that the condition is incurable and the person will always be unwell. That's also incorrect.

Because of these misunderstandings around psychosis and mental health in general, it can be hard to seek help. We can all help challenge this prejudice.

What is schizophrenia?

If you experience psychosis for a long period of time and it is having a severe impact on your life, the psychiatric term schizophrenia may be applied. This can also include having low energy, loss of motivation, less enjoyment of life, withdrawal from others and trouble concentrating.

The diagnosis of schizophrenia is quite rare - about six to seven people out of every 1000 in Aotearoa.

What is your path forward?

There are effective treatments that can help you manage psychosis and live a fulfilling life. The main components are medication and talking therapies.

A doctor or specialist may prescribe antipsychotic medication to reduce the voices, delusions etc. They may also prescribe medication to manage things like anxiety or poor sleep. Talk to your doctor about what is right for you. Make sure you are well informed about possible side effects (and how to manage them).

Don't stop taking your medication or change your dose without talking to your health professional first. Stopping suddenly can make you feel worse.

Talking therapies such as cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT), Acceptance and Commitment therapy (ACT), trauma informed, strengths-based, psychodynamic and mindfulness-informed therapies can be very helpful. Research shows that a combination of medication and therapy is more effective than medication alone.

A good therapist, who has a good understanding of psychosis and who you trust, can help identify patterns of thought and behaviour that are unhelpful. They will work with you to learn new ways of coping with challenges, and help build your resilience.

Treatment can also include cultural support, family interventions, occupational therapy, and social work support. These are important as they support people with communication, activities of daily living, and re-engaging with the wider community.

Strategies for recovery

There is no one answer to recovery, but there are some key aspects that are considered important by "experience-based experts" - people who live with psychosis. Essentially, looking after your own mental, emotional and physical health is key to getting through tough times and to maintaining wellbeing.

- Recovery will be a journey. Work with your cultural, family and other supports, and keep trying. Things will get easier.
- Learn about psychosis and read/listen to stories of other people who have found a way to cope.
- Get to know your early warning signs or triggers, and identify and reduce stressful activities.
- Develop strategies you can use when you feel an episode building. Work with a trusted whānau member or support person and your doctor or therapist. Make a plan for difficult times.
- Look after your health: eat well, make sure you get enough sleep, and include some exercise in your life. It's best to stay away from drugs and alcohol.
- Connect with cultural healing practices that use karakia, mirimiri (massage) and rongoā (natural medicines) drawn from mātauranga Māori.
- Use relaxation exercises like breathing, yoga, meditation, or massage.
- Spend time on activities that bring you purpose and joy, such as time in nature or creative hobbies - music, art, kapa haka and more.
- Peer support groups can connect you with others who have similar experiences. Find a group here: mentalhealth.org.nz/groups